Mussels Remain Quarantined

The annual six-month quarantine on all species of mussels taken from the ocean shore of California has been extended for an indefinite period by the California State Health Department, according to Dr. K. H. Sutherland, Los Angeles County health officer. Usually the quarantine ends on Oct. 31. Dr. Sutherland warned that at certain seasons the mussels taken from the ocean floor adjacent to the coast may contain a toxic material that is highly poisonous to man. This year the State Department of Public Health is maintaining the quarantine beyond the usual date as a result of continuing high toxicity in the mussels.

In general, the state's quarantine prohibits the taking, sale, or offering for sale mussels from or from California coastal waters, except for use as fish bait. Mussels for use as bait must be broken open prior to sale and labelled "Mussels May Contain Poison — Unfit for Human Food."
